GIVING AND RECEIVING FEEDBACK

The secret to a culture of exceptional performance

“50% of employees report that their managers avoid having candid discussions on performance.” Mercer

One of the most valuable communication skills a leader can have is the ability to deliver constructive and effective feedback. Coaching, feedback, performance reviews, disciplinary discussions and general evaluations are often the toughest of all conversations to have. Good leaders understand the importance of feedback on personal growth, professional development, improving employee engagement and creating exceptional workplaces. Unfortunately many leaders avoid giving feedback, or give feedback poorly. When we receive poor feedback, we reject it, take offense and we don't see it as a learning opportunity. In this one day workshop you will learn how to give great feedback that is proactive, timely, transparent and targeted.

COURSE CONTENT

In this workshop you will learn:

- A simple model for giving feedback
- How to prepare for a feedback conversation
- What does effective feedback look like
- How to create an action plan for your feedback discussion
- The importance of empathic listening
- How to receive feedback without being defensive
- What you can do if you receive invalid feedback
- The importance of timing in feedback

Giving effective feedback and having a good understanding around giving and receiving feedback is crucial in creating high performance teams. Effective feedback is key to leadership, management and high employee engagement within your team.
